FREDERICIA OVERVIEW

Fredericia, right in the centre of Denmark, has a unique history still very much in evidence today. The port is in the centre of the city – only a short stroll from the charming and historic midtown, with cosy shops, excellent restaurants, and sights.

Whether perusing Northern Europe's best preserved ramparts, still encircling the town, or strolling in the perpendicular streets, passing by beautiful old houses, memorial plaques and monuments – authenticity and history is present and alive.

After the devastation caused by the Thirty Years War in a largely unfortified Jutland, King Christian IV realized the necessity of building a strong fortress in Jutland, and decided that this project could be combined with his plans for building a large town in Jutland. A fortified encampment was built on a point of land called Lyngs Odde, near the current location of Fredericia, with a rampart stretching to either side of the point, thus protecting the encampment from attacks. However, the fortifications were not perfect, and when Swedish Field Marshal Lennart Torstenson invaded Jutland, he was able to break through the ramparts. It was Frederick III who was finally able to complete the plans for the fortification, also adding a flank fortification on nearby Bers Odde as suggested by Danish Imperial Marshal Anders Bille.

On 15 December 1650, the King signed the document giving the town its first privileges, and work on the new fortifications could begin. In 1651, the town was named Frederiksodde (Frederick's Point) after the king, and on 22 April 1664, it was given the new Latinized name of Fredericia.

Fredericia is beautifully situated right by the shimmering Lillebælt, beside two coastlines, two superb bridges, and a magnificent view of Danish nature. Fredericia offers easy access to many sights in the region, easily reached within one hour: Fredericia truly is a key port for adventures.
